Probate services

Dealing with someone's affairs when they have passed away.

What is Probate?

Very generally speaking, it is the administration of someone's financial affairs and personal matters upon their death, regardless of whether they have made a will or not.

We provide a Probate service that relieves the deceased's relatives from the stress and burden of sorting out these matters. In most situations, circumstances will require the attention of a lawyer, for example to deal with property or bank accounts - so it makes sense to put the matter in the hands of an experienced and understanding firm like Andrew & Andrew.

How can Andrew & Andrew help?

With a great deal of experience in this area, together with a caring approach, you will find we deal sensitively and sympathetically with the deceased's legal and administrative affairs. We will deal efficiently and correctly with ensuring matters like tax and liabilities are settled, protecting the estate from future claims, and that various institutions such as banks, local council, gas and electricity providers, are all informed.

After an initial appointment to assess how much help you need, we can let you know the costs and likely time scales.

If the person who has died leaves a will

If necessary, we can help locate the will. There will be one or more executors named in the will and we can assist in the process of confirming they have the necessary authority to deal with matters, and then help in the way that suits them best.

If the person who has died did not leave a will

We can help a close relative of the deceased apply for a Grant of Letters of Administration which will give them authority to deal with matters on behalf of the deceased's estate. We can help with any disputes, and provide an efficient and effective Probate service.
